Ellie Kendrick

Anne Frank in The Diary of Anne Frank

Like many 19-year-olds, Ellie Kendrick is wrapped up in her first year at college—in her case, Cambridge University. But at the moment she is also showing up on the big screen in the acclaimed coming-of-age film An Education, in which she plays one of Carey Mulligan's school friends. Last spring and summer, Kendrick starred as Juliet in Romeo and Juliet at Shakespeare's Globe Theatre in London. And in the past few years, MASTERPIECE viewers have glimpsed her in all-too-brief roles in Lewis: Whom the Gods Would Destroy and Prime Suspect 7. With The Diary of Anne Frank, the up-and-coming actress commands our full attention at last—literally—by appearing in virtually every scene, charming, shocking, and vexing us in the role of the precocious teen who reports the ordinary and terrifying events for eight Jews hiding from the Nazis during World War II. Writing in the Independent on Sunday, Hermione Eyre was enthralled, describing Kendrick's Anne Frank as "perfect. As well as being a true heroine, she is tart and willful and naughty."

Deborah Moggach

Screenwriter, The Diary of Anne Frank

A prolific novelist (16, so far, including the bestseller Tulip Fever), Deborah Moggach had her biggest audience to date with her movie adaptation of Pride and Prejudice, a blockbuster starring Keira Knightley that received the 2005 BAFTA nomination for best screenplay. MASTERPIECE fans fondly recall her adaptation of Nancy Mitford's loopy satire, Love in a Cold Climate, which aired in 2002. Poles apart is The Diary of Anne Frank, for which Moggach won the right from the Anne Frank Estate to use Anne's actual words in the dialogue and voiceover. Of her approach, she says that past adaptations have tended to sanctify Anne and make her over-sweet. "I wanted to be true to the real girl. Sure, she got on people's nerves; but she was also full of life, her own sternest critic, and, above all, she made people laugh." A novelist at heart, Moggach admits a fondness for writing for television and film. "I like moving back and forth, between the interior world of the novel and the conflict-driven life of drama. I also like actors because they call me 'darling'."
